A fascinating tour through the curious history of Western civilization told through its most emblematic invention – the book.

As well as leafing through the well-known titles that have helped shape the world in which we live, Oliver Tearle also dusts off some of the more neglected items to be found hidden among the bookshelves of the past.

You'll learn about the forgotten Victorian novelist who outsold Dickens, the woman who became the first published poet in America and the eccentric traveller who introduced the table-fork to England.

Praise for The Secret Library:

'If Oliver Tearle's book is half as interesting as his website Interesting Literature, his Twitter feed and his HuffPost blog, it's going to be very interesting indeed' - John Lloyd CBE, Creator of QI

'A fascinating and engagingly genial stroll through several hundred years of literary anecdote and insight. Tearle is wonderfully good company as of course are the protagonists themselves' - Simon Evans, Comedian

Oliver Tearle is Lecturer in English at Loughborough University, where he completed a PhD. He founded the blog Interesting Literature: A Library of Literary Interestingness; the accompanying Twitter feed, @InterestingLit, has over 100,000 followers including the makers of the television series QI, the Oxford English Dictionary, the British Library, the British Museum, and the Times Literary Supplement, as well as numerous writers, comedians, journalists, politicians, and academics. His proudest achievement is coining the word 'bibliosmia' to describe the smell of old books.
